It was a hot Saturday morning and I was sprinting down the field trying to get the soccer ball from the other team. This was our championship game. If we won this game not only would we get a trophy but they would write about us in the newspaper tomorrow. I knew we had to win this. I pushed myself harder and harder until the exhaustion was starting to climb up my body. I was just about to get the ball when all of a sudden I collided with another player and fell to the ground. At first, my body was numb and I thought I got knocked out. I looked down at my knees and they were covered in blood. I tried to move my wrists but something felt wrong. My coach ran to me and kneeled next to me. He asked if I was okay. My mom ran up and kneeled down too and combed the grass and dirt out of my hair with her fingers. She quickly reached into her knapsack and pulled out a bottle of water for me to drink. I could tell she was worried because the wrinkles in her forehead were showing. She and my coach checked all my limbs and everything felt okay except for my wrists. The shock wore off and the numbness started to go away, but then the pain began to kick in. I began to cry from the pain and embarrassment. I felt so dumb. How did I not see that other player? They wrapped my wrist in a bandage and took me to the doctor. Luckily it was just a sprain and I would just have to wear a wristband for the next two weeks.
